Texas A&M University-Corpus Christi Receives Outstanding ‘A’ Grade Rating from WhatWillTheyLearn.com Web site

CORPUS CHRISTI, Texas – The general education programs at Texas A&M University-Corpus Christi are one of only 17 nationwide that earned “A” grades in the WhatWillTheyLearn.com rating system. The University was cited for its exemplary job in making sure that students who graduate have the skills and knowledge that are the essential tools of an educated person.

WhatWillTheyLearn.com is an interactive Web site for students, parents and teachers that grades college and universities on whether they require their students to complete coursework in seven key academic areas: English composition, literature, foreign languages, American history, economics, math and science. The site was launched by the American Council of Trustees and Alumni, a nonpartisan, nonprofit organization dedicated to fostering excellence and accountability in colleges and universities.

Texas A&M University also earned an “A” rating. Out of the 718 colleges and universities reviewed, both Texas A&M University and Texas A&M-Corpus Christi campuses’ general education curricula stand in the top 3 percent, and Texas A&M was the only flagship university system in the nation where multiple campuses earned an “A” grade.
